The address of the evening was by Mr. Shaw on "Gods Call, Our Re. spons." Following this Rev. C. P. Williamson made a few pleasant remarks. Then came the consecration service, the most impressive and soul stirring part of the Convention, and as it closed, and the delegates repeated the "mizpah" benediction, it was with the feeling that though the Convention was not large in numbers nevertheless it was a glorious success.

The Great Work of the French Academy

The principal occupation of the Academy, pursued without cessation, and having in its completion but a perpetual recommencement, has dictionaries. One of these, which was begun in 1778, is the "Historical Dictionary," whose plan was suggested by Voltaire. It is a compilation of etymology and history, and of the variations in the significance of words set forth in numerous examples as attested by every French writer inclusively since the fifteenth century. Although this dictionary has in fact only reached the letter A, it has been published in an enormous caurto volume. It will never lateompleted. The Academy decided, some 12 years ago, to abandon the

There is, however, besides the "Historical Dictionary," a "Dictionary of Usage," wherein are given only the words with their different accomplished and short and decisive commples of ordinary use. From 1891 to 1878 seven editions of this work have been published, each radleadly differing from the others. Indecil, a latterage is constantly subjusted to modification. The sense of one word is altered; another word is no longer employed; still another is created to meet a new requirement, as "felegram" or "bicyclot," or a modern thought must find exorthography, in which the constant tendency is toward simplification. In the seventeenth century one wrote, "il debvoit;" in the eighteenth century, "il devoit;" today we write, "il devait." The diction-ary is framed as a standard, and regards his soldiers, but he never hence, like a veritable labor of Penelope, must be begun again as soon rapport with them.
